Insurance Industry Impact – Sustainability & Resilience: What Legislators & Other Stakeholders Need to Know*

IEC Perspective

A question that we have been hearing from policymakers and other industry stakeholders is why insurers should be interested in Environmental, Social & Governance (ESG) issues. In this article we will explore the nexus between the insurance industry and ESG issues with a focus on climate and sustainability.

The insurance industry is an important stakeholder in making society more resilient to risks, protecting both people and the planet. From pandemic readiness, to embracing the digitization of business and preparing our workforces for the future, the insurance sector is on the front lines. The industry is already working with governments, companies, and individuals at a global, national, and local level on many ESG issues.

Insurers are uniquely placed to provide businesses with an informed view of climate-related exposures, vulnerabilities, and hazards. We have access to the latest tools and risk management practices and can assist in developing climate resilience strategies. The industry's perspective on strategic developments can provide optimism about the ability to deliver against the targets required to limit global warming.

While we are consistently bombarded by the negative impacts of climate change, positive developments have recently been made, such as a pandemic related drop in global energy demand, new commitments from world leaders, new green technologies, and green investment.

We have made progress, but significant work remains. Companies can adopt mitigation measures to curb carbon emissions and develop net-zero business models, leveraging insurer's experiences. The insurance industry can assist risk managers and investors with decarbonization transition risks to achieve a carbon neutral future.

Insurers can provide expertise with resilience and the unavoidable physical risks associated with climate change. As an industry, we can provide businesses with adaptation measures to tackle these risks. Climate risk is a business risk and a risk to society. Sustainable business practices are not only good for the bottom line, but for society. Insurers can share expertise in managing risks from environmental extremes and help customers build resilience to natural hazards by developing products that provide protection to help customers achieve a low-carbon future, while also generating incentives for new, sustainable business practices.

As we look for ways to combat climate change, much emphasis is placed on the consumption of resources – what we buy, what we eat, and how we travel. But how and where we invest can also have a significant impact on climate change. Responsible investment is simply a strategy that integrates environmental, social, and governance (ESG) factors into long-term investment decisions. The objective of responsible investment is to create social and environmental value and financial returns. The investment requirements of transition are too large for the public sector to accomplish alone, but governments can catalyze private financing of transition projects by taking a share of risk and investing directly to support resilience and adaptation.

Insurance Industry Impact – Sustainability & Resilience: What Legislators & Other Stakeholders Need to Know (Cont'd)

IEC Perspective

At Zurich, being a responsible and sustainable company is at the foundation of our business. We're swiftly reducing our carbon footprint, helping our customers adopt more sustainable behaviors, supporting employee wellbeing, and helping communities become more resilient to natural hazards and extreme weather. We've conducted more than 15 post-event reviews of weather-related disasters ranging from hurricanes to wildfires around the world. In the U.S. and Canada, we've studied 2018 Hurricane Florence, 2017 Hurricane Harvey and the 2017 and 2018 California wildfires and 2016 Fort McMurray wildfire.

To study these events, we use our Post Event Review Capability (PERC) approach, an open-source methodology designed to evaluate how natural hazards events turn into community disasters and to provide practical recommendations that promote community resilience.

To conclude, insurers are crucial stakeholders in making society more resilient to climate related risks and are already working with policymakers to forge a more sustainable future.
